Through a critical ethnographic study of a borderlands high school, Dr. Helmer investigates Mexican-origin students’ engagement and resistance to learning. Analysis of videotaped classroom discourse, in two distinct learning contexts, shows how student and teacher imaginations of one another and learning, course materials, and member identities contribute to either engaged or resistant learning and teaching stances.